HIRING AN IN-HOUSE VIDEOGRAPHER?

Six skills to screen for before you make the offer.

BEFORE YOU HIRE

A GREAT REEL ISN'T ENOUGH.

If this person will plan, shoot, edit and deliver your content, you're hiring more than a camera operator.

Their reel shows what they made. These six areas reveal how they work.

- Start with the workflow, not the gear list.

1

THEY UNDERSTAND THE IMAGE, NOT JUST THE CAMERA.

Different shoots require different choices for frame rate, shutter, exposure, white balance, focus, codec and color profile.

WITHOUT IT

Footage can mismatch between cameras, limit the edit or create technical problems that aren't visible until post-production.

THE CHECK Ask how they would set up a camera for an interview versus event coverage.

2

THEY CAN LIGHT THE SUBJECT.

A strong videographer knows how to control direction, contrast, color, reflections and mixed light, not just follow a standard three-point setup.

WITHOUT IT

Colors can shift, highlights blow out and reflective products become difficult to fix in post.

THE CHECK Ask how they would light a product shoot in your office.

3

THEY KNOW HOW TO CAPTURE CLEAN AUDIO.

They should understand which microphones fit the situation, where to place them, how to monitor the recording and when a backup is needed.

WITHOUT IT

Background noise, echo, clothing rustle, interference or clipping can make otherwise strong footage difficult, or impossible, to use.

THE CHECK Ask which microphones they would use for a filmed podcast interview.

4

THEY SHOOT FOR THE STORY AND THE EDIT.

Strong videographers turn the brief into story beats, interview prompts and coverage that will connect in the final cut.

WITHOUT IT

You can end up with attractive footage but no usable sequence: missing transitions, incomplete actions and too few cutaways to shape the story.

THE CHECK Ask which shots they would capture for a company overview video.

5

THEY CAN INGEST, EDIT AND DELIVER CLEANLY.

They should know how to organize and back up footage, work with mixed formats, and export the right codec, resolution and bitrate for each destination.

WITHOUT IT

Footage gets lost or mislabeled, old assets become difficult to find, and oversized or poorly compressed exports lose quality after upload.

THE CHECK Ask how they organize and ingest footage before editing.

6

THEY WORK WELL WITH THE TEAM.

A strong videographer collaborates with marketing and creative teams to understand what assets are needed, communicate concerns early and keep production aligned with the brief.

WITHOUT IT

Feedback becomes personal, revisions become frustrating, and a technically strong hire can still create a difficult team environment.

THE CHECK Ask how they manage feedback and multiple rounds of revisions.

ONE PERSON CAN COVER A LOT. NOT EVERYTHING AT ONCE.

A strong in-house videographer can own lean, repeatable content. As the workload or production complexity grows, the smarter move is to bring in the right support, not expect one employee to absorb every production role.
